Catalog Description:	Examine the politics surrounding land preservation and commemoration throughout American history. Discuss how landmarks, landscapes, sacred places, monuments, and memorials have become central to the ways that Americans remember the country's past. Readings and lectures focus on particular environmental movements, the tourism industry, the complexities of the National Park Service and U.S. Forest Service, issues in understanding culture and ecology, and the differences between land management strategies practiced at the local, state, tribal, and federal levels. The class draws conclusions as to how landmarks shape the public's views and understanding of the intersections among environment, race, and gender in American history.
