Milton D. Jacobson, assistant professor of engineering graphics and mathematics at the University of Minnesota, Morris, was one of the speakers at the annual meeting of the National Association for Research in Science Teaching last week in Washington, D. C.

Speaking on the reading difficulty of physics and chemistry textbooks, on reading difficulty equations
Jacobson presented the research/he had undertaken for his doctoral dissertation last year. He spoke to the entire group of almost 200 participants.

The research group is an affiliate of the National Education Association and the American Association for the Advancement of Science.
